

The FCC should not implement any proposal that would lessen Indiana's Telephone Privacy law protections. Indiana's Telephone Privacy law has improved our quality of life at home. The phone rarely rings during our evening meal to solicit us for goods or services that we neither want nor need. In fact, our privacy during the daytime hours have been well preserved by Indiana's law as well. We feel that our home is our home now -- not an extension of the office. We understand how important strong guidelines that prevent telemarketers from calling can improve lives. We do not wish to have the protections offered by this law diluted.
